Higher education financing help now a few clicks closer for Coloradans

CollegeInvest launches enhanced website to help families pay for college

CollegeInvest, a not-for-profit division of the Colorado Department of Higher Education, has launched an enhanced website with new content and features to help Colorado families with their college financing needs – no matter where they are in the process.

Visitors to CollegeInvest.org will notice new tools including specialized sections for families and students from childhood through college and beyond. Educators, employers and financial planners also will find sections designed specifically for them.

“We made CollegeInvest.org comprehensive to serve our many different audiences,” said Jennifer Robinson of CollegeInvest. “Anybody who is interested in knowing more about financing higher education will find information tailored to fit their needs on the new site. CollegeInvest gathered feedback from clients and site visitors to ensure that the site is a comprehensive and useful tool for financing higher education.”

Families and students can access online calculators to find projected costs of college, how much they’ll need to save, and projected Colorado state tax deductions for investing in a CollegeInvest 529 plan. In addition, CollegeInvest.org makes available a variety of relevant resources including workbooks and tools for planning for college and tips for making the most of financial aid.

CollegeInvest clients can access their accounts to view account balances and history, and download account maintenance forms.

A calendar on the home page lists information on events and workshops led by CollegeInvest’s team of college savings and financial aid specialists across the state.

“The website was designed to help make higher education more accessible for Coloradans,” added Robinson. “The answers to your college financing questions are right at your fingertips.”
